Reminiscences by Era Morgan Davis

EDITED BY CHARLES H. BUSHA

(Editor's note: Mrs. Davis was asked to respond to some questions about her early life in rural Pickens County, S.C. She then prepared the following reminiscences that many readers of the newsletter will probably find both interesting and informative.)

Like many of the people who lived in rural South Carolina during the Great Depression of the 1930s, I have vivid memories of those years. But members of my family were luckier than some people. We had a roof over our heads and food on the table three times a day. Maybe some of that food wasn't the best—but if we got hungry enough, it tasted pretty good. In those days, we never actually realized that we were poor! Our parents never talked about the problems that they faced. And although they lost a home and four renter farms, as well as a small tract of land that our mother inherited, they never discussed their losses. They only said that we had to move to grandmother's renter house in order to take care of her, because grandfather had passed away. Thus, we did have a place to go. Many other people were not so fortunate.

In those days only a few good roads had been constructed, and all in our area were made of dirt. The wheels of wagons and cars dug out ruts in the roads. Moreover, the roads were very crooked, or they had more curves. They were built by following the path of least resistance (or following the lay of the land). Some even followed the flow of streams, and there were no bridges over some branches and creeks. Vehicles were sometimes even forced to ford streams. Road work was done with drag pans shaped like scoops, and mules pulled them when the implements were use for digging or shoveling dirt and rocks. The drag pans scooped up dirt piles that were about the size of a small wheelbarrow and then moved them to where they were needed on another part of the road.

During my early years, there were very few automobiles, and only a small number of manufacturers of motor vehicles were in business. The early cars were open vehicles with tops; some of them were equipped with side curtains that could be added when needed. Those early cars had neither heat nor air-conditioning, and their car seats were always hard. Bricks or stones that had been heated at the fireplace were often used by vehicle occupants to keep their feet warm during cold weather. The bricks or stones were wrapped in pieces of old wool clothing and then placed as foot warmers on the floors of wagons, buggies or on the few cars that were available. Blanket-type wraps called lap robes were sometimes placed over passengers' legs and knees, as well as the foot warmers, to make wintertime travel more comfortable. Lighted lanterns were also used at times instead of the hot bricks and stones. Early automobiles were not equipped with automatic starters; they had hand-operated cranks that were attached to the front of the vehicle engine to "crank" the car (start its motor).

Paper was scarce during my early years, and postage stamps were only a few pennies each. Most clothing worn by people in the so-called "good old days" was homemade. Usable pieces of shirts and pants that had been worn by men were recycled to make clothes for children. A while later, some companies that made animal feed began to use print material to bag their goods, and the bags were used to make clothing. Smaller white cloth bags in which sugar and flour was purchased was also used to make dishcloths. Even the string the bags had been sewn with was saved and used, as strings were often scarce. The matured seed pods of vegetables and flowers were harvested and saved so that seeds would be available during the next springtime planting of gardens and cultivated fields.

When I was growing up, all families had vegetable gardens. Most of them also had fruit trees, grape vines. Also, wild berries and nuts were harvested—nothing was wasted. Whatever edible food items that were not readably consumed were canned or dried. Pork was also preserved by other methods—usually cured with salt or sugar. Most farm households had chickens as sources of meat and eggs; many also had pigs/hogs, calves and cows, the latter of which provided milk and butter for the table. Any food that could not be produced on the farm was purchased from stores, and that included coffee, sugar, salt and pepper. Five pounds of sugar could be bought for twenty-five cents. My father would go to Seneca in Oconee County each March (a long one-day trip in those days) to purchase supplies and food. (At that time we resided at the present-day site of Daniel High School in Pickens County.) He brought back enough store-bought food for our family and the four renter families that lived on our place. After the renters had planted, harvested and sold their cotton crops, they would pay my father for what he had purchased for them earlier in the spring.

Electricity was not available on our farm for many years. My uncle, who lived about a mile above us, purchased one of the first radios that was made. We would walk to his house each Saturday night and listen to the "Amos and Andy Program." At that time, some of our renters thought that they had to go to town every Saturday. People did not work on Sundays until textile mills were established in the county. In many households, wives would prepare their Sunday meals on the previous Saturday in respect for "the Lord's Day." Also, at our local grammar school, which was in session for two months during the summer so that children would be available to help gather crops in the fall, the teachers would march students across the road to Lawrence Chapel Methodist Church for revival meetings. (Can you imagine that?) In our family we were Methodist—but not denominational—just convenience worshipers.

In most households, family members had to carry water from springs or wells. (Houses did not have plumbing in those days.) Water was drawn from deep wells that had been dug into the soil until the water was reached. Fresh water was drawn from wells by means of a rope or chain that was placed over a pulley hanging above the well. Water buckets were attached to each end of the ropes or chains so that one bucket could be let down and then filled with water, then brought back up while the second bucket was being lowered into the well and also filled with more water. Everyone drank water from the same dipper. Another method of drawing water from wells was also used. A round length of an oak log from which the tree bark had been removed was equipped with a crank. The log and its crank were attached to a frame above the well. A long rope or chain was attached to the log, and a water bucket was placed at the other end of the rope or chain run through a pulley. By turning the crank, the bucket could be lowered, filled with water deep within the well and then brought back up. Wells were topped or capped with a wooden frame which had a lid that kept trash from falling into the water. Years ago, clothes were washed outside of the house and usually in the back yard where a fire could be started to heat water. Soap that was used to clean garments was often homemade from rejected animal fat and lye which had been cooked together in a big washpot. After clothes had been scrubbed and the bad soiled spots had been battled out or spanked with a battling stick, they were placed in a washpot of pre-heated soapy water and then boiled. Then, they were lifted out of the pot, stirred well in a tub of water, rung out and placed in another tub of water that contained a bluing solution that prevented yellowing.

After having been rung out for the second time, clothes were hung on a wire clothesline. Some washing of clothes was done at nearby branches or creeks and then hung on shrubs or bushes until they dried out. Then, they had to be removed and taken back to the house to be ironed, if necessary.

During my young years, breakfast was prepared at about daylight, lunch was eaten at twelve noon and supper was ready around nightfall. There were no fast food restaurants in those days. Bread that was placed on the table was cooked at home, and few people back then bought cakes; they cooked their own. But some cookies were sold in stores. Cheese could also be purchased there. Our family seldom had meat on the table except on Sundays, and then more than likely the meat was poultry. Chickens were caught out of the yard, killed, cleaned and then prepared for the Sunday main meal. When pork was served on Sunday, it was often meat that had been preserved with salt.

I was grown before commercial airplanes were available for travel, but my oldest son, who was an Air Force officer, has owned two airplanes. I don't remember when I first saw a television set in operation, but, one of my sons gave me a TV that had been discarded by his business. Although I now have a computer, thanks to my son, I am still computer dumb. By the time I think I know how to use the computer, my son upgrades and improves it. Then, I must again learn how to operate it. I couldn't even type before I began to use a computer.

I was born near Central, South Carolina, but my family soon moved to the Praters Creek area of Pickens County. By the year 1917, my parents had purchased land adjoining the present-day site of Daniel High School, situated between Central and Six Mile, S.C. They lost that property in 1930 (during the Great Depression). Then, we moved to a place about seven miles west of Pickens, S.C. Our new home was situated between the Praters Creek community and Twelve Mile River. I also lived in Gainesville, Georgia, for about two years. Then, I lived in Charleston, S.C., for about a year and in Lake City, for another year. Blackstone, Virginia, was also my home for a while. During most of my past years, I have resided in various sections of Pickens County, S.C.

Before I became involved with genealogy, I could not have cared less for family history, because making a living and caring for my family kept me quite occupied until my sons had grown up and moved away. Then, my eldest son, who was an officer in the Air Force, encouraged me to record handwritten information about our family's history. Some of my ancestry and relatives were close-knit, but as I began to record data about relatives, I realized that there was too much that I didn't know about them. Thus, I began to do genealogical research to learn more about my family's history and lineage. As family demands had decreased, I had more time to do genealogical research. Then came the computer and a good chance to search for more information. Now, I reap great joy from thinking that I am of some help to other people as they also seek genealogical information. Sometimes, when I get very involved in a search, I even forget to eat. I am now interested in any history going way back, but I am not yet concerned about ancient history, art and society.

During bygone years, residents of many rural communities in upstate South Carolina, were more inclined to come to the aid of neighbors than they seem to be today. When people became sick or experienced various problems or difficulties, their neighbors sat with them or provided some type of needed aid. Also, if a farmer's barn was destroyed by a fire, people within the neighborhood temporarily put aside their own work and other activities in order to hold what was called a "barn raising"—the construction of a new barn for their neighbor. Moreover, some residents of the community even helped to cut and dress timbers needed for the new barn's construction. And the labor completed on behalf of their unfortunate neighbor was done without any thought of monetary compensation: People were simply pleased that they could come to the assistance of a friend in need.

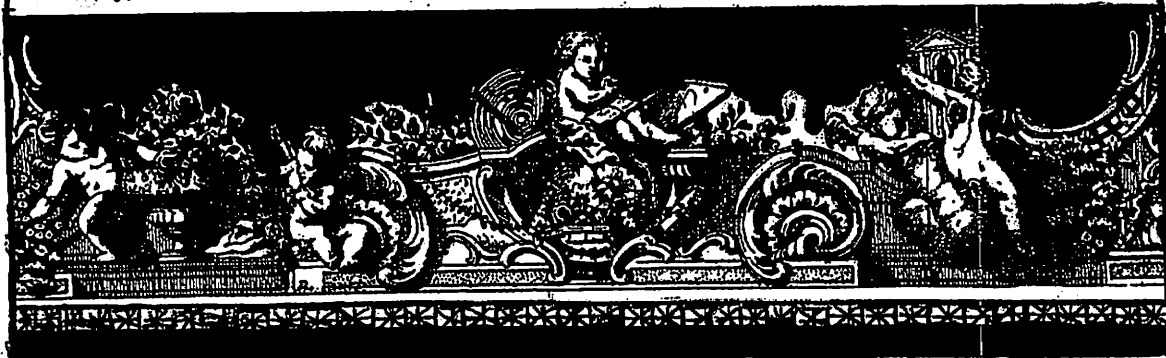

Many years ago, funerals were primarily family affairs; they were not as professional or as expensive as they are today. Funeral homes that were operated by trained morticians were few and far between. Thus, many bodies of persons who had resided in rural areas were not embalmed or otherwise prepared for burial by professional undertakers. For example, when my grandmother died in 1936, my mother and I prepared her body for burial. That task was known back then as "laying a body out". We dressed my grandmother's body and then placed it on a wide board that was extended between two chairs. Then, her arms were crossed, and two quarters were placed over her eyes to keep the eyelids closed until her lifeless body became cold. My father then went to the rural community of Six Mile to purchase a casket at a store which kept them stored on a second floor above its grocery section. After my father's return with the casket, grandmother's body was placed in it where it remained at her home until a funeral was held. I also recall that floral arrangements in those days often consisted of fresh posies gathered from the yard or a flower garden. Also remaining in my memory is the very sweet lilac fragrance that was once commonly used as an air freshener. I don't especially like that scent even today; it reminds me of the deaths of family members or close friends. When I sometimes feel that my present-day home lacks splendor, my mind wanders back to my grandmother's early life; she gave birth to her first two children in a shack that had a dirt floor.

All seven of my brothers, as well as Curron, my husband, served with American military forces during World War II. In addition, all my in-laws served in armed services during the war, with the exception of one who was deferred from the draft because of his 4F classification (physically unqualified). In the Vietnam War period, our three sons were members of the U.S. Armed Forces. Boyd, who served as a military policeman, was stationed in Alaska then. Jerald, our oldest son, served as a pilot/navigator in the U.S. Air Force. He was an officer who flew troops and equipment in and out of South Vietnam during the war. Lowell, another son, was an aircraft mechanic during the same military conflict. While on a flight stopover in Anchorage, Alaska, Jerald, our pilot son, was able to spend a few hours with his brother Boyd. At that time, Jerald was on a flight from New York to South Vietnam. After he continued the flight with another stopover in Japan, Jerald also visited there with Lowell, his other brother. Following Jerald's successful return flight to New York, our son immediately called me and my husband with good news about our sons, all of whom were well but far away from home. All three events took place within a period of only three days. It's a small, global world in which we now live!

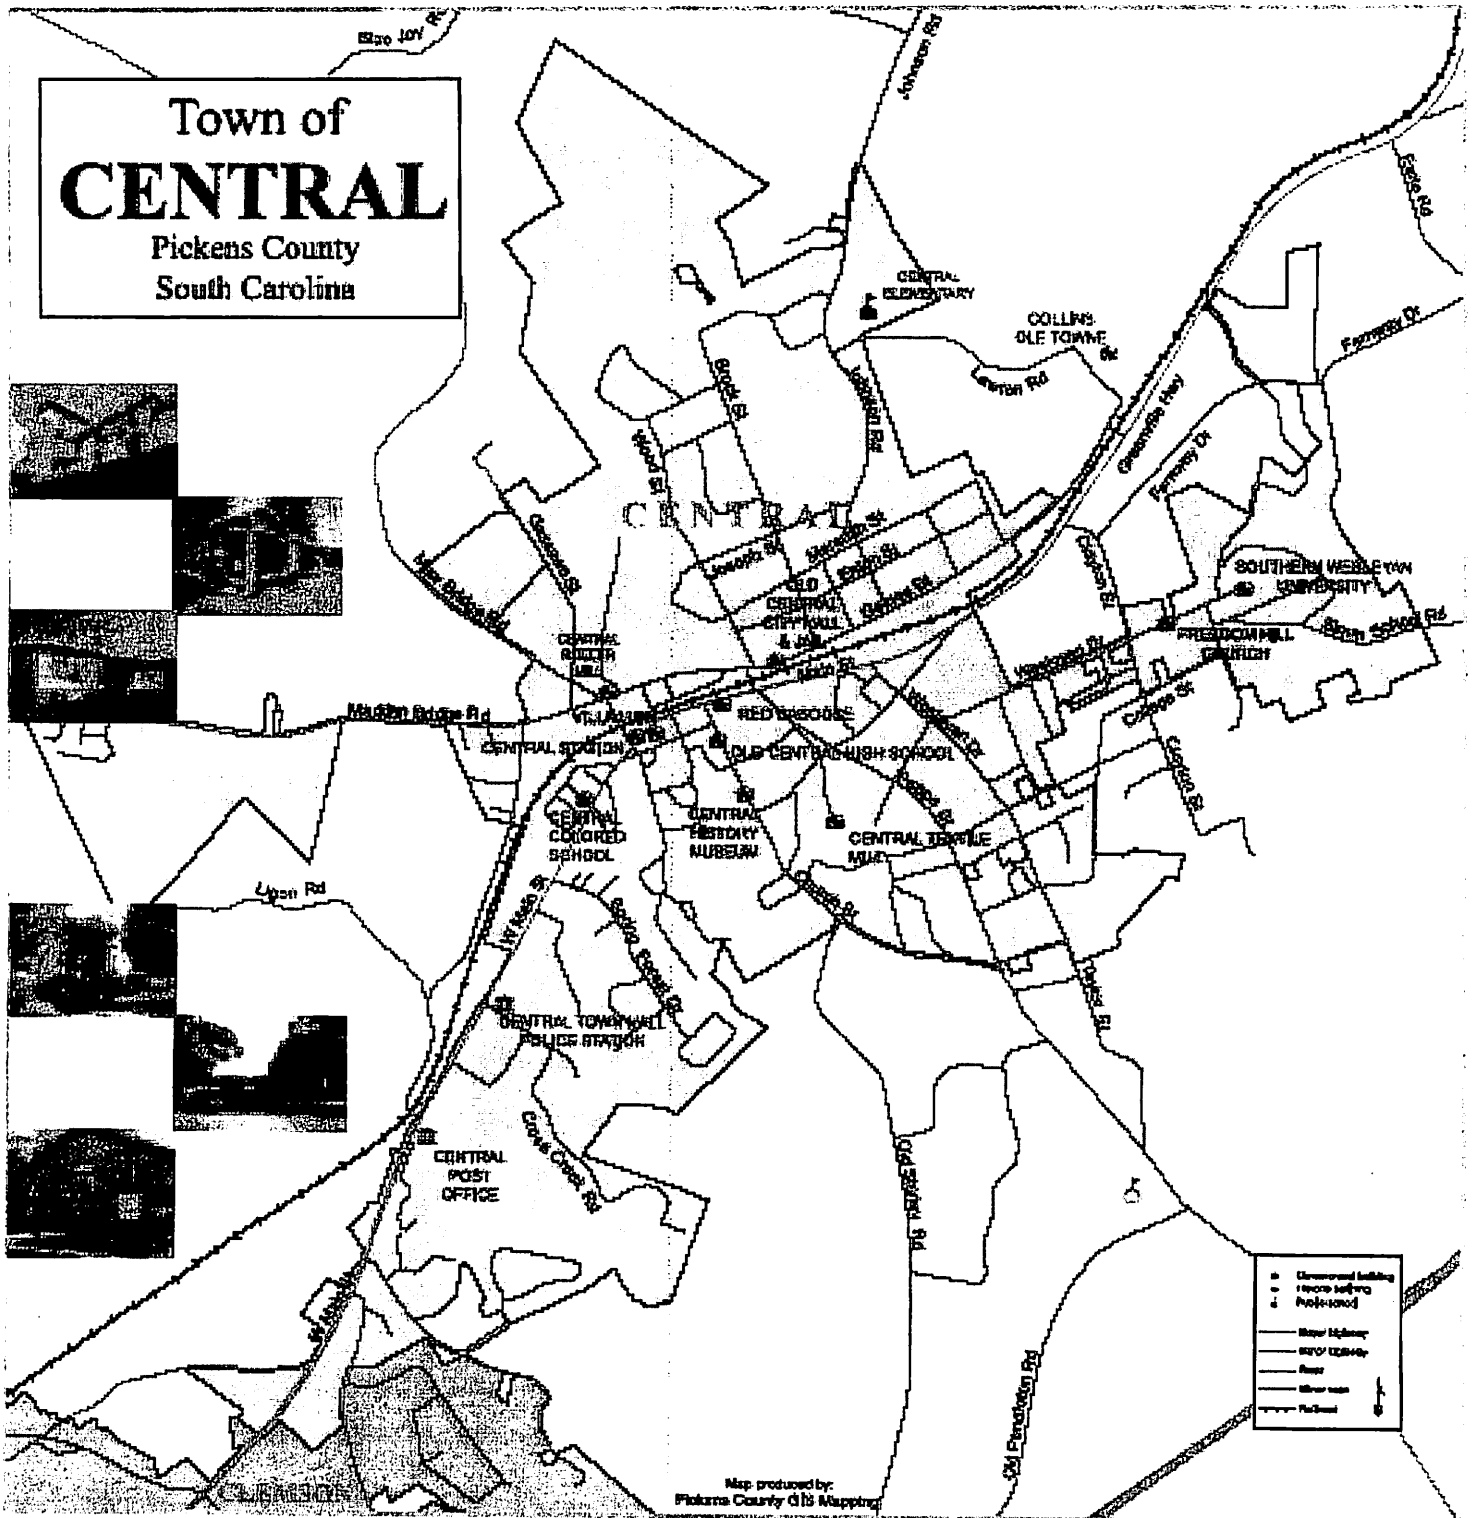

My father's brother served in the U.S. Army during World War I, and I vividly remember the influenza epidemic that swept the nation during and after those years. Back during the U.S. Civil War (from 1861 until 1865), that is also known in the South as the War Between the States, two of my great-grandfather's served in the Confederate States Army. One of them was still alive during my childhood, and I can well remember him. I don't recall ever having heard about any ancestors who might have served in the Spanish American War. Several of my ancestors did take part in the Revolutionary War that was fought to gain our nation's independence from Great Britain.

To conclude this long narrative about some of my memories of the past, I would like to note that young students have a much better opportunity today to obtain a good education than I ever had during my youth. Now, young people also have more advantages—and, unfortunately, more disadvantages—than I ever had while growing up. They are also confronted with more perilous temptations. And let me also add this: Concerning my long and healthy life, my family medical doctor told me to keep on doing whatever it is that I'm presently up to, because I must be doing something right! But I feel that my maker and my good, hardy ancestors also had something to do with my long earthly existence.

CENTRAL, SOUTH CAROLINA

Discovering Central's History Today

Many historic buildings remain in Central, despite the loss of others, including the old Morgan Store. You can discover the buildings featured here as you travel through our town today.

CENTRAL, SOUTH CAROLINA

A Southern Town's Past and Future

Railroads and Farming

In 1873, the town of Central was established as a train headquarters where engines were changed. The town was named for its central location between Atlanta and Charlotte where rail lines were joined. Central rapidly filled with dispatchers, conductors, engineers, porters, and other employees of the Atlanta and Richmond Air-Line Company. The Morgan Mercantile Store was one of several in town that sprang up during this era to supply needed merchandise to the new residents. Central's boom town period abruptly ended in 1897 when Southern Railway, which had taken over the rail service, moved their headquarters from Central to Greenville. Most of the railroad employees moved with it. Central continued to serve farmers as a place to shop, to have cotton ginned and cornmeal ground. J. N. Morgan's daughter Jessie, who lived in this house until 1994, recalled the customers who were farmers, "You know back in the days of cotton farming, we would run people all through the year, bill them all their supplies and what it would take to live and make a crop, and in the fall, they'd come 'round to settle up."

The Textile Mill

The Morgan Store gained a large new group of customers in 1903 with the opening of the Issaqueena Cotton Mill. Workers' cottages were built around the mill, which were just down Church Street from the store. You can see many of these cottages, now privately owned, just a block from where you are standing. The mill remains operational. J. N. Morgan assumed full ownership of the Morgan Store upon his brother's death in 1914, and continued to run it until his own death in 1923. His wife Minnie and daughters Jessie and Jennie then took over the business. For more than two decades they hired managers to run the establishment while keeping the books themselves. When their manager retired in 1949, the sisters decided to close down the store. The building passed through other hands until 1974, when it was razed. Newspaper accounts describe its demolition as a sad day in Central's history.

THE CENTRAL MUSEUM

The Central Heritage Society purchased the Morgan House in 1995 as headquarters for the Central History Museum. Several of the rooms are almost exactly as Jessie and Jennie Morgan left them, while others focus on Central, South Carolina history. Local artifacts include everything from textiles produced at Issaqueena Cotton Mill to the merchandise counter from the Morgan Store.

The Morgan Family

In 1885, Jephtha N. Morgan opened a merchandise store in Central and had this house built in 1893 in anticipation of his marriage. Jephtha and Minnie Morgan had two daughters, Jessie and Jennie who participated in the family business by keeping the books for the store. "Miss Jessie" and "Miss Jennie" never married and lived in the house most of their lives. Jessie occupied the house until 1994.

For over 100 years, members of the J. N. Morgan family actively participated in the social, religious, and civic life of Central. Jephtha Morgan was one of the founders and President of the Bank of Central. Minnie Morgan was a founding member of the local chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. The family was involved in Mt. Zion Methodist Church. Jessie and Jennie held dances at the house for local young people, hanging Japanese lanterns in the backyard and playing the piano for them. They were involved with Converse and Clemson Colleges and were Girl Scout leaders.

In addition to social activities and bookkeeping for the store, Jessie and Jennie practiced domestic arts typical of women of their era. Canning and preserving food was a family tradition, as well as sewing and knitting. A tour of their home, which still holds most of their furniture, clothing, dishes, and decorative pieces, provides a sense of what visiting with Miss Jessie and Miss Jennie must have been like. As curator Anne Sheriff puts it, visitors can "just imagine that the occupants went to town and never returned."

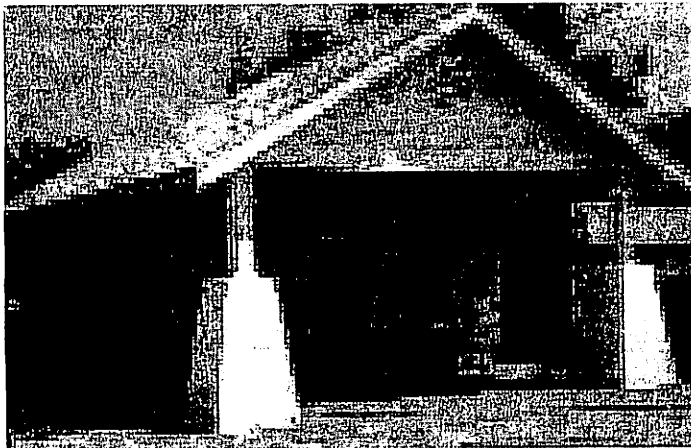

The lives of Jessie Morgan and Jennie Morgan reveal a bygone era, but their values and activities are still relevant. Involvement in church and school and a myriad of social activities that preserve the past and better the community are alive and well today in Central.

The Morgan Mercantile Store and the History of Central

Just down the street from the Morgan House was the Morgan Mercantile Store, which also belonged to Jephtha Morgan. J. N. Morgan and his brother, F. B. Morgan, built the store on land owned by their father in 1885. The store opened just a few years after the railroad town of Central came into existence. The Morgan Store held an important place in Central's evolution from a railroad center to a cotton mill town.

Old Pendleton Chapter News

For our June 17, 2009 Meeting, the members decided to have a dinner meeting at Collins Ole Towne in Central, South Carolina. This is a 1930's-era recreated Village, consisting of old school, general store, barber shop, molasses mill, and sawmill. The cost for the dinner and tour is $6.05 for members and 16.05 for non-members. If you plan to come, please send your money to the following: Nancy Holcombe, 1504 Mile Creek Road, Six Mile, SC 29282-9449, 864-868-5593. Make the checks to OPGS.

Collins Ole Towne

All the buildings at Collins Old Towne were constructed on the site. Much of the material used was taken from old homes around Central that were being demolished or renovated. Buddy and Kathie Sims donated an old house on the mill village that was demolished. John Randolph provided windows, doors and beaded ceiling from an old mill house that is used in the schoolhouse. Much of the ceiling in the General Store came from the old Dillard Shoe Shop in Central. Other lumber used in construction of these buildings was taken from trees on the farm and sawed into lumber at the sawmill here at Ole Towne. Buildings were purposely designed and constructed to reflect the period being depicted.

The General Store. The store is well stocked with memorabilia concerning early life in a small community as well as items from the town of Central. Collection includes merchandise bought by Roy and Pat Collins from throughout the United States as well as country store equipment of the 1820s through the mid 1950s.

Barber Shop. The depression-era barbershop features a reconstructed motorized barber pole, coat rack and several other items that were used by the late W. C. Dobson in his barbershop in Central. Joe Tankersley, the final owner, of this shop loaned several of the items on display. Roy and Pat Collins purchased the barber chair, pedestal lavatory and many other items of interest during their travels.

Schoolhouse. The latest addition to Ole Towne is the schoolhouse. It features a bell tower with a functioning bell. Just tug the rope and you get the feeling it's school time again. Step inside and sit in one of the old desks some dating back to the early part of the century. Several of these were used at the Old Central School. John and Clara Head of Central donated these. Roy and Pat Collins purchased other desks in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Tennessee. Many old school books and other memorabilia can be found in shelves along the walls. A stage at the front of the room provides a platform for the children to perform. Oh yes, in cold weather the wood-burning heater will keep you cozy. Roy and Pat Collins

The Central Railroad

The town of Central had its beginning with the arrival of the Atlantic and Richmond Air-Line Railroad through Pickens County on September 28, 1873. Since the village of Center was midway between Atlanta and Charlotte, about 133 miles each way, the Railroad Company decided to set up its shops and the place was called Central Station. On March 17, 1875, Central was incorporated as town extending one-half mile in each direction from the Airline Depot. A depot and houses were erected for those who worked on the railroad. Stores were opened to provide supplies and food for the people. Since this was the Terminal, shops for railway workers were built.

Branching off east of the track, toward the textile mill, was the turntable, where engines were changed and re-fueled. Just behind the water tank, in a large grove of trees, a long rambling hotel, that became quite famous up and down the railway, was built. The hotel served not only as an eating-house, but also quarters for telegraph operators, dispatchers, ticket office, waiting room, and a sample room for drummers to display their lines of merchandise for inspection by local merchants.

The town was destined to see a great change take place in the year 1897 when the Southern Railway moved its headquarters to Greenville. The first trainload of cars pulled out Sunday, July 4, 1897, leaving a dazed group of citizens. Houses were left vacant and business was at a standstill. Later, a fire broke out that almost destroyed Main Street due to the lack of fire fighting equipment.

Local businessmen, in 1903, opened opportunities for employment, by organizing Issaqueena Mill. The Wesleyan College (now Southern Wesleyan University) began classes in the fall of 1906 and brought in new people. World War I broke out and many Central men were drafted or enlisted to fight the Axis. It was in 1918 that influenza hit the nation and Central was not spared. Before the stock market crash in 1929 Central had been growing and enjoying the boom economy that followed World War I. After 1929, Central's two banks failed, mill stocks fell to low ebb, and Issaqueena Mill passed into the hands of a receiver.

Although railroads and cotton mills declined in importance throughout the region in the last half of the 20th century, Central actually continues to grow with new roads, industries, restaurants, library, recreational facilities, Clemson and Southern Wesleyan student apartments, and new homes.

In the late 1990s, the Central Heritage Society cooperated with the South Carolina Heritage Corridor in attempts to restore and preserve the town's historic areas. Central History Museum (former home of Jephtha, Minnie, Jessie and Jennie Morgan, a local merchant's family) was designated as a site on the SC Heritage Corridor. The old Central High School was listed on the National Historic Register. Other tourist sites in Central include: Central Community Club (formerly Central Colored School), Freedom Hill Church, Red Caboose, Old City Hall/Jail, and Collins Ole Towne.
